As student midwives, we embark on a journey to support women through the miraculous journey of childbirth. We are increasingly encountering a diverse array of birthing preferences, including alternative choices. While advocating for the choices of the women you care for, it's equally essential that you prioritise your own wellbeing. Self-care is not just an indulgence; it's a necessity for providing optimal care to expectant families.

First and foremost, you need to acknowledge the emotional toll that supporting alternative birth choices can take. Whether it's home births, water births or hypnobirthing, these approaches may challenge the traditional medical model and require you to adapt your practices accordingly. This adaptability can both increase your knowledge capacity but also be emotionally demanding. Hence, carving out time for self-reflection and emotional processing becomes paramount. Engaging in activities such as journaling, mindfulness or seeking supervision can provide invaluable support.

Making time daily to use your midwifery student planner and reflective journal can elevate your self-care. By scheduling dedicated time for relaxation, exercise and personal activities in your planner, you will honour your wellbeing amidst demanding schedules, and adapting to those you care for.

Another important factor in building your resilience when caring for families is to make sure your personal support network is strong. Like you would tell those that you provide care for that having support is vitally important during the process of pregnancy and beyond, make sure you apply the same priority for yourself. Think of your studies as a similar process in which you are growing and learning, and support from trusted friends is a necessity. Make sure you are scheduling in your planner time to connect with your network of supporters.

Reflective journals offer a safe space to process emotions, identify stress triggers and celebrate achievements. Regular journaling promotes self-awareness and resilience, aiding in the cultivation of healthy coping mechanisms. These tools serve as compasses, guiding you towards a balanced approach to life and work, fostering sustainable practices that nourish both your professional journey and personal growth, whilst avoiding burnout in your caring capacity.

In essence, self-care isn't a luxury; it is an essential component of being an effective and compassionate student midwife. By nurturing your own wellbeing, you can strengthen yourself to navigate the dynamic landscape of alternative birth choices while simultaneously enhancing the quality of care you provide to expecting mothers and their families.
